STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE (Include Personages, Dates, Events, Etc.)

The exact date of the construction of Blandfield is unknown, but it was probably built circa 1750 for William Beverley (1696-1756), son of Virginia's first native-born historian, Robert Beverley (circa 1673-1722). The estate was named after William Beverley's wife, Elizabeth Bland. Blandfield was sacked by Federal troops during the Civil War, but the house was not damaged.

Architecturally, Blandfield belongs to an important group of mid-Georgian Tidewater mansions which echo the monumental style of Palladio as interpreted in English architectural design books. This group includes Mount Airy, Menokin, Elmwood, and the Carlyle House in Alexandria. Blandfield lost all of its interior woodwork as a result of an 1844 remodeling; it was again altered in 1848 by Van Ness, the contractor who restored the interior of Mount Airy after its fire in 1844.

The plan of Blandfield, with its twin stair halls and spaciously proportioned rooms, is most ample and unusual. The house remains one of the largest colonial plantation mansions in Virginia and is still owned by the Beverley family.
